MARKET ANALYSIS Assessment of the commercial value of the HSCT requires a comparison between its economic worth and cost-based price. This includes the following: Traffic demand Cash flow Market share Airline return on investment Passenger value of time Tax law Productivity Useful life Aircraft scheduling Quantity Fleet sizes Development cost Passenger revenue Recurring production cost Operating costs Manufacturers return on investment The overall evaluation process, specially designed economic and operational modes, and supporting data were the products of this study. Frequent consultation with airlines, including Northwest, , Federal Express, American, Delta, United, Pan Am, Japan Air Lines, Alitalia, and British Airways, provided invaluable exchanges regarding traffic projections, schedules, economic parameters, and related matters. Expert consulta-tion on such issues as aircraft scheduling, utilization, and productivity as well as passenger value of time was received from Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Purdue University, and Quinnipiac College. Douglas-developed econometric methods were used to forecast traffic through the year 2000. The traffic estimates for the 18 international IATA regions were the data source. Further considerations of range, traffic, and mileage over land reduced the base to 10 regions. These 10 regions were used as the arena of competition between the HSCT and an advanced subsonic transport reference vehicle. These regions are primarily inter-continental, over water, and long range. Four regions comprise between 85 to 90 percent of the total inter-national traffic (Figure 2). The North Atlantic and North and Mid-Pacific are the major traffic regions. In 1986, the North Atlantic recorded more than twice the re. . . This item ships from La Vergne,TN. Paperback.
