Excerpt from Scientific Memoirs, Vol. 2 During the course of the past few weeks I have met with a series of phenomena in certain experiments on the subcutaneous injection of choleraic comma-bacilli into the bodies of guinea-pigs which appear to be sufficiently remarkable to merit special record. I propose, therefore, in the present paper to give a detailed account of these experiments and their results, along with a few brief notes regarding their apparent significance. I. - Source of the material employed in the experiments. The commas employed in all the experiments belonged to a series of cultivations originally derived from a case of cholera which was admitted into the Medical College Hospital on the 21st January 1886. A portion of a fresh evacuation was sent to me for examination on that day. It consisted of a brownish-grey, alkaline, watery fluid, and an abundant sediment of gelatinous, somewhat pinkish flocculi. The examination of fresh preparations, made immediately on the arrival of the material, showed that it...
