Excerpt from Service in Memory of Larkin Dunton: 1828-1899, Held at the Boston Normal School, April 28, 1900 Those of us who knew him best had often occasion to mark that although he had not received especial training in music and art and literature, and never made any pretension to a large knowledge of those subjects, it was always the best they had to offer that he most cared for. It was characteristic that the noble measures of Founttain of Light - adapted from a great Haydn symphony should have appealed to him so strongly. His old pupils will never forget the deep feeling with which he always spoke of Raphael's Sistine Madonna and of the hours that he had spent in Dresden sitting reverently before it. It was my especial privilege to spend many hours in reading poetry with him, because of some work for children which we were planning together. I would pass one poem after another to him and wait for his decision as to its value to the little folks, as he so loved to call them. His pleasure in what he read was beautiful to see; sometimes it was positive delight. When the melody of the poem especially pleased him, or when the glimpses of nature brought back the dear experiences of his own boyhood, he would read aloud with an almost boyish joy. I shall never forget submitting to him a little poem of William Blake called Infant Joy. He read it aloud, exclaiming, with that never-to-be-forgotten light in his eyes, Beautiful, beautiful I once heard him say that in his boyhood, attracted by its wonderful splendor and dignity, he had committed to memory...
