Excerpt: . . . which he had removed from a man 62 years of age, of spare habit, who, five years ago, began to suffer from symptoms of stone, and was then relieved of a small calculus, by the median incision, so far as he could judge from the appearance of the cicatrix in the perineum. A very short time, however, after this operation, the symptoms of stone re-appeared and increased in severity, especially during the past year. The urine was continuously bloody and voided every ten minutes in great agony. After putting the patient in bed, elevating the hips, and administering alkalis for a few days, he was sounded. The instrument entered the bladder, which was much contracted, without difficulty, but no rapping sound against the stone could be obtained, only a rubbing could be felt. It could be appreciated, however, by the exploration that the calculus was...
