Not illustrated. 1889 Excerpt: .one, he himself finds in the propositions which he has adopted from Lotze s theory of cognition, and which form the foundation of his own system. But how differently does Lotze himself judge regarding the importance of epistemological questions! In the very work to which Eitschl appeals for the theory of cognition which he defends, that is, in his Logic // and Metaphysics? Lotze takes up a position of most strenuous opposition to all preliminary epistemological investigations.² The pretentious discussion of theories of cognition, says he in the same connection, has very seldom led to practical results, --it has certainly never originated the methods with the exposition of which it has entertained itself. On the contrary, the problems have themselves necessitated the discovery of methods of solution. He expresses his conviction of the essential unsoundness of efforts to reach a foundation of Metaphysics through the analysis...
