Since he had come into the Harley Street house Julian had been much happier. His perturbation had gradually evaporated until now scarcely a vestige of it remained. The little doctor s talk, above all the sight of his calm, thoughtful face and the aspect of his calm, satisfied room, gave the coup de gniu to the uneasiness of a spurious and illomened excitement. When the power of wide medical knowledge is joined to the power of goodness and of umbrageous intellectuality a doctor is, among all men, the man to lay the ghosts that human nature is perpetually at the pains to set walking in their shrouds to cause alarm. All Julian s ghosts were laid. He smoked on and grew to feel perfectly natural and comfortable. The dogs echoed and emphasised all the healing power of their small and...
