Excerpt from The Sevenfold Law of Ministerial Training: An Address Delivered to the Students of Rawdon College, Leeds, at the Annual Meeting Held June 29th, 1887 And yet I speak from experience, and free contact with students, when I declare this is the thing the College student has the most difficulty in holding aloft and maintaining in its pureness and integrity, simplicity and beauty. For all of us this is the toughest task we face, but at the beginning of our training it is a burden almost insupportable. The very act of going through the College gates is often the lowering of the soul's aim. Outside, and before entrance, the instinct for souls had free course, and was glorified in its victories over fear and its gift of naturalness and self-forgetfulness. The passion to save men by preaching Christ and Christ crucified was the master-key of every sermon and of every prayer, of all study and of all work, but now attention is so absorbingly fixed on grammars and lexicons, on propositions to be proved and lectures to be heard and remembered, on rules for the introductions and divisions and applications of sermons, that the tools of the workers hll the vision and shut out the man and the men. Every operation during the ten hours of the day withdraws the student from the humanity that is waiting and needing to be saved, the soul that hungers for the truth of God, and directs him to the books in which that truth is printed or the processes by which it may be written. The intellectual aspects of life are in the ascendant, and the heart is in danger of being...
