THE DEATH OF CUCHULAIN I AND now--for he was spent with many wars--Emer, Cuchulains wife, the hero led To a deep Ulster glen, remote from men And from wars rumors. Fair the landscape was, With slumbrous, waving woods, and plashy brooks, And blossomed meadows. There the blackbirds song At morn and eve was heard, and the wild doe Played with her fawn along the shadowy glade; And on still nights chimed in the distant sea, Not mournfully, but as the far-off strains Of faery lullabies--like magic harps That crooned sweet notes of drowsy rest and sleep, Of old, when the De Danaan banished pain After a bloody fight. His tent they set Beside a pleasant stream whose ferny marge Swelled soft and green, a rest for weary eyes; And there with all her household Emer hoped For quiet days, and nights from peril free While the great Hound of Ulster gathered strength To front his foes once more. But Connaught Maeve, The wily queen that ruled the rugged West, Enraged because Cuchulain had flung back Her mighty host, and all her scheming foiled, THE DEATH OF CUCHULAIN Sought out his hiding place and rumors sowed Within his mind, by messengers disguised, How that red war had desolated all His land, Muirthemne; how his hall of fame Dundalgan, where his fathers dwelt of old, In ashes lay. The hero then began To fret his soul, desiring to depart To instant strife. But Emer and her maids Made shift to...
